The two agencies said in a joint statement that there's been "no change" in terms of communications between the two governments. It said, however, that the Obama administration had stopped making such representations since 2017. The official explanation for the administration's change of position was that Obama had assured Trump that the U.S. would stay in the 2015 nuclear deal.

"This was reflected in the fact that, in 2017, the President asserted the president's executive authority under [the Defense Production Act of 1950] to waive these restrictions and issued an executive order," a senior administration official told The Washington Post in an email. Trump has said there's no reason for the U.S. to stick with the nuclear deal because, among other issues, it doesn't address Iran's ballistic missile program. Iran "behaved 648931e174
